

The presentation will focus on young offender evaluations and the need to consider developmental and mental health factors in forensic assessments for the courts. I will review how psychological research on adolescents has influenced several major United States Supreme Court decisions that have led to major changes in sentencing practices. The implications of these changes for forensic assessments of young offenders will be reviewed, including an update on risk assessment instruments.